

Using Groups in Academic Advising

Rebecca Ryan

Abstract

This topical session will explore institutional or program situations that extend the academic advising delivery system beyond individual one-on-one interactions with the student. Group advising allows for flexibility and creativity in meeting students' needs. Benefits and challenges will be discussed, as well as various ideas for delivery. The connection between advising and teaching will be explored and the basic tenets of design and program considerations will be offered. Participants will have the opportunity share their experiences with group advising methods and outcomes.
